Authority, Affinity and Resistance in the Making of the Modern Middle East.

This course surveys how interaction with increasingly influential foreign interests, and responses to them, both assimilative and resistant, shaped leading currents in Middle Eastern experience from the late eighteenth century onwards. Themes include imperialism in historical interpretation, in perceptions and framings of the region, in forms of political, economic, cultural and social change, and in Middle Eastern intra-regional, international and global relations. Each session will feature a discussion on a theme preceded by suggested readings from course texts, related published documents, and specialized scholarly journal articles assigned for discussions on each topic, the latter to follow. Students will each complete a research essay chosen from the latter, along with a number of smaller critical exercises, and a final examination.

Course texts: The following are suggested as basic empirical primers. Each has its own style and emphases.

Cleveland, William, A History of the Modern Middle East, (Boulder, CO; Westview, 2008). Topically wide-ranging, touches usefully on most relevant topics, but is a little woolly on evidentiary specifics, despite its length. [ISBN – 13 9780813340487]

Idem., The Near East Since the First World War: A History to 1995, (London; Longman, 1996). This is the follow-on companion to the above. (Available via on-line retail outlets, but the publisher seems to have had recent production and distribution problems with it.) [ISBN – 13 978 0582256514]

Khater, Akram, Sources in the History of the Modern Middle East, (New York; Houghton Mifflin, 2010). This is a useful document collection, which we’ll be using frequently. There is a 2004 edition which is just as good and generally a bit cheaper. [ISBN – 13 978 0618958535]

Learning Objectives: students will understand the main events, context, currents and debates on outside power and influence in the formation of the modern Middle East. They will write an academic paper of about 4000 words on a selected topic, producing an original analytical synthesis based on current leading scholarship. They will also evaluate and discuss the context and significance of selected primary documents in translation, developing this into an appreciation of historiographic methods and discourse, as they relate to the region. They will thereby establish a robust foundation for further higher degree studies.

Course Work and Assessment: Course marks will be compiled as follows: Term paper, 40%; final examination, 40%; course work 20%. The latter will be comprise attendance, contribution to class discussions and working atmosphere, and short document, article and book analyses in class.

Research Essays. Students must complete one, to be submitted no later than class session 13. The following twelve titles, with attached reading suggestions are recommended for students to choose from, although they may originate a title and sources of their own, by agreement with the course instructor.
